A BABY IS IN TRAINING

The Athletic Tendencies of a Seven-Month-Old Child.

Miss Vivian Hamon of Kennett, Mo., was always known among her girl associates as an original. She had her own ideas, unobtrusive, but firm. Particularly independent from a feminine point of view, she designed her own dresses, usually in defiance of current fashions, but always charmingly. So—with the curious maturity of southern girls—when she was married, a slender slip of girlhood 18 years old, she determined that if she had a child it should be an original baby.

A child was born last December, when the mother was 19 years old. Before its birth she studied—as a student "grinds" for a college examination—all the books and articles concerning the rearing of babies upon which she applied with scientific rigor the principles of child training which she had learned—like a polytechnic graduate upon his first enterprise of surveying.

This child, when two months old, "chinned" her mother while holding her in her arms. A month later she supported her weight of sixteen pounds by hanging with the grip of her minute fingers from a horizontal bar like a trapeze rod. So hard and "fit" is she that, although her penchant is rolling off her bed, she never cries over the knocks she receives, as if they severely hurt her.

The name of this child is Albertalee Hamon Hays. Her father is Charles Elmer Hays, formerly a star right guard on the football team of the Kentucky Military Institute, near Louisville. Her grandmother on the maternal side is Mrs. C. H. Rainy, today a crack horseback rider, swimmer and all round athlete. Age 29 in years, but much less in temperament, Mrs. Rainy is called "the youngest grandmother in Dunklin county."

During the six years which she spent as a student in a convent seminary at Nevada, Mo., Mrs. Hays read of infant prodigies of mentality like John Stuart Mill, who was a proficient Greek scholar at 8 years old. Without aspiring to rear an intellectual genius, the thoughtful Missouri girl determined to apply a similar process to the physical well-being of her children—not for the production of circus strong men and acrobats, but of wholesome, healthy and attractive men and women.

Fresh air and loose clothing were the young mother's hobbies in rearing her baby. From the beginning, although it was winter, she kept the child in a room without a fire, and at night lowered the windows two inches from the top. She dressed the baby in a sort of flannel bag with a drawstring below the feet, permitting the little legs free play for exercise. Hence Albertalee was known for a time as the "hobble skirt baby."

Along with her physical attainments, Albertalee acquired a remarkable talent for silence, independence and self-command. It is almost unknown for her to cry. Like all babies, she frequently bumps her head with more or less violence, but beyond a puckering of her lips she shows no sign of pain.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

UNHAPPY.

"So she married a manicurist?"

"Yes."

"Is he happy?"

A Tooth For a Tooth

BY CHARLES ALDEN SELTZER.
Copyright, 1910, the Pearson Publishing Company.

It was spring. The house the Pollard twins lived in was having an addition built and the garret finished off with a rose window that looked like one great red eye.

"It's too sweet, isn't it?" Valora Pollard said, pausing where she swung perched upon the gate.

"It's a good deal like the rich Spencers," only of course, theirs is blue and red instead of just red," said Leah Gardener, perching upon the other side of the gate.

They swung to and fro for some time, gazing at the house.

"I had a little pony, he was a dapple gray," Valora sang, "I lent him to a lady to ride a mile away. She whipped him, she slashed him, she rode him through the mire—"

"Some says your grandmother Pollard is havin' the addition built to keep your mamma to home, so she won't run away any more!" Leah Gardener broke in.

The gate came to with a bang and Valora leaped sideways over a little puddle of melting snow into the yard.

"But my papa says," drawled Leah, oblivious of danger, "that your Aunt Doris is doing it with her school-teaching money because she's going to marry Cal Barry from South Charlotte and live here."

"You got off my gate!" shrieked Valora Pollard.

"Shan't!" the gossip defied.

"What's the matter, Valora?" Valora's twin sister Narcissa came bursting from the house.

"Leah Gardener says your mamma's a renegade!" Valora answered.

"Did not!" retorted the wrongfully accused.

"You might's well of," Valora said. "Everybody does say so, and you mean it, and you lie—they all lie!"

"You lie yourself," said Leah Gardener, losing her hold on the gate picket, but quickly recapturing it.

"Get off our gate," insisted Valora sidling toward her sister.

Leah Gardener drew one foot from between the painful pressure of the pickets, thoughtfully.

"My father owns this gate and I don't have to get off it. He's got a mortgage on it. He's got a mortgage on most every house in this town!" She victoriously extended her tongue to its utmost capacity.

Narcissa Pollard glared back, her soft blue eyes crossed hideously inwards while without warning, her sister leaped upon the gate and sent that which offended her, with a stinging slap in the face, backward to the ground.

The Pollard twins' pretty Aunt Doris was in the kitchen ironing her pink chambray dress when she heard Leah Gardener's screams. She put her iron upon the stove and hurried to the door, dabbing her flushed face with her apron.

"What is the matter?" she asked severely.

A school teacher has to use that voice of severity, but all those who knew the Pollard twins' Aunt Doris loved her and saw through her voice. Leah Gardener sat up and yelled through the gate pickets.

"Why, Leah! What is the matter?"

"Valora slapped me, wait till I tell father!" Miss Gardener answered.

"She provoked Valora, Aunt Dolly," Narcissa said. "She says her father has a mortgage on our gate."

"No." A dimple centered right in the pink of Aunt Dolly's soft young cheek. "This gate Leah's father hasn't any mortgage on."

Leah glared slowly.

"Come in the yard, Leah," Aunt Doris said.

She came out of the house and took Valora's hand.

"Tell Leah you're sorry, dear," she said. "It isn't nice to slap anybody."

Leah lost suddenly over the gate, but remained without.

"I ain't sorry," Valora said.

Aunt Doris looked at her wonderingly and drew Valora to her and did not laugh. "Pooh, temper in a teapot," the way she nearly always did at Valora's tantrums.

"There's a misunderstanding," she said, "and we must clear it up."

"I haven't said any of the things Valora will tell you I have said," she called out with grammatical precision and went virtuously on, swinging her head to make her white ribbon hair sway and ripple in the sunlight the way naturally curly hair that you don't braid does.

It must have caught Aunt Doris's eye for she said, "It's Saturday, and would you both like your hair played and with a ribbon for the afternoon, and can you keep clean pinafores fresh, for Mr. Calvin Barry is coming this evening?"

The twins bounded up and down and began asking about Mr. Calvin Barry until Aunt Doris's pink cheeks were as flushed as the June roses that would bloom on the red-rose-bush, now hidden under the melting snow. She gave them each a cookie while she finished her pink chambray to wear that evening. It was Easter vacation now, but every Friday night Aunt Doris was brought home from where she taught her country school and stayed until Sunday night, when she went back, so that on Saturdays she ironed her pretty dresses and waists against company Saturday evenings. Lately it was always Mr. Calvin Barry.

"What was it that Leah did?" Aunt Doris asked, indifferently.

To get to the bottom of things she believed in finishing spiteful anger, and revenge, first. Sometimes a cookie did it or re-arranging the hair, there were many ways.

Valora thought a moment.

"She said she'd heard grandmother is having the addition built to keep our mamma from running away again. She just the same's called her a renegade, like the rich young Mrs. Spencer does."

THE FASHIONABLE NORFOLK EFFECT.

THE blouse that is made in Norfolk style is one of the smartest and best liked for simple costumes. This gown shows it combined with a five gored skirt and made of plain material trimmed with striped. It is exceedingly attractive and it is much to be desired for between seasons and early autumn. It makes a really ideal costume for out-of-door sports, it is in every way satisfactory for morning wear, and, as the shield can be added, it becomes equally well adapted to the street. The patent leather belt shown in this instance gives a smart and up-to-date touch. The skirt is cut in five gores. In this case it is trimmed with an applied band, but it can be cut off and joined to a straight band, or either of the same or contrasting material, if preferred, and it can be finished either with the high or natural waist line.
